The Under Secretary of State, General Walter Bedell Smith, 57, who first joined the Indiana National Guard in 1910, became a downy-cheeked first sergeant at the age of 18 and grew up into something of a top brass curmudgeon, tried to explain his temperament to a Washington reporter. Said he: "It is possible that some of the less attractive characteristics of my personality were acquired at a very early age as an infantry sergeant."

Executors of the new foreign policy—Smith, Allen Dulles, Bradley

On the Eisenhower Team

William H. Jackson, Chairman, the President's Committee on International Information Activities: The new nine-member board of experts in psychological warfare, intelligence, propaganda, and public relations was directed last week to report by June 30 on how to achieve a "unified and dynamic effort" in the psychological aspects of the cold war. It is possible Jackson may also be head of whatever new agency his committee recommends to coordinate propaganda and subversion work now divided among the State Department, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Psychological Strategy Board, the Mutual Security Agency, and the Army's Psychological Warfare branch.

Jackson, 50, was formerly Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, a job in which he was succeeded in 1951 by Allen W. Dulles, now appointed CIA chief. During the war he had been chief of strategic intelligence on the staff of Lt. Gen. Jacob Devers in Europe and subsequently deputy intelligence chief in Gen. Omar Bradley's Twelfth Army Group headquarters.

A Princeton and Harvard Law School graduate, Jackson has been managing partner of J. H. Whitney & Co., a New York investment-banking firm and a director of the Spencer Chemical Co., the Great Northern Paper Co., and the Bankers Trust Co.

At California's Travis Air Force Base, Major John Eisenhower had a brief meeting with Marine Lieut. Allen Macy Dulles, son of the new head of Central Intelligence Agency and nephew of the Secretary of State. Macy was on his way back to Korea to inspect the tour of duty of his brother, who was a patient at the Walter Reed Army Medical Hospital and was being treated for battle wounds.
